I can't work out how to edit it in: Tor Browser 10.0.17

I added you to the project. Perhaps it will work now

It partly helped- I can see a lot more options than previously! There's still no way to edit the issue, however, which suggests it might simply be you're the only one allowed to edit your own words.

Perhaps. However, I also had hard time trying to find where the edit option is... Just in case - I am sending a screenshot

Thank you for the screenshot! Now I see what you mean, and do indeed have that ability (as well as wiki page creation- I'll start work on that).

Other major ones left are Abrowser, Pure Browser (even though Pure OS by itself is misbehaving), maybe also Brave and Waterfox (can these be built without nonfree stuff?)?

Mobile version considerations

I don't have any Android device to test on, although it might be possible to use some emulator instead.

It'd still be great if someone else showed up who could do porting&testing on mobile.

Despite the fact we're willing to accept porting contributions even to browsers that are not 100% free, we're still interesting in finding out about the free ones. Does anybody know of any 100% libre FF- or Chromium-derived mobile browsers that can be built under an FSDG-compliant distro?

#11 - 09/03/2021 12:25 PM - jahoti

I suspect IceCat can be built on FSDG-compliant distros. Ungoogled Chromium might have that option, yet it's pointless seeing as support for extensions has been deprecated in the mobile version. I'm not sure about anything else, albeit with an inclination to believe something Chromium-based might be accessible through Replicant (c.f. Android WebView).

In any case, this will be much easier if we can find somebody with a mobile device!

I am not so sure. Official mobile releases stopped at 38.6.0. I know discontinuation of the Losedowns version was due to its build process relying on some nonfree M$ stuff. With Android version I'd expect similar problems, except It'd not be nonfree deps but rather deps that haven't been patched and packaged for FSDG...

Bad news, although good to know

That complicates things. I'll see if I can find who was packaging it for F-Droid, which has more recent versions, and perhaps how they did it.
